Ground Safety and Ground Collusion

In the area of commercial aviation worldwide, airlines suffer high costs from damage that results from ground-related occurrences. Apart from the economic consequences, increased safety risks are also of concern to the organisations involved.

Ramp accidents cost airlines significant amounts of money but these accidents only become a flight safety risk if they represent an airworthiness risk and are either undetected or unreported. The increasing use of composite materials in aircraft manufacturing may lead to increased risk because often, after being hit, a composite surface returns to its original shape and the damage underneath is not visible to the naked eye. A simple 'tap' test might not detect a delamination at an early stage or in specific areas.
